A journey through history, art and nature

The castles of the Aosta Valley: a thrilling journey through time

From the twelfth century, the local lords constructed fortified buildings for defensive purposes, such as the castles of Graines, Châtel-Argent and Cly, which perfectly exemplify the oldest style of castle architecture.

However, from the fourteenth century onwards, the architectural features serving to defensive purposes were superseded by monolithic structures, such as those of the castles of Ussel and Verrès, which were then gradually embellished with decorative features, as can be observed at the famous Fénis Castle among others.

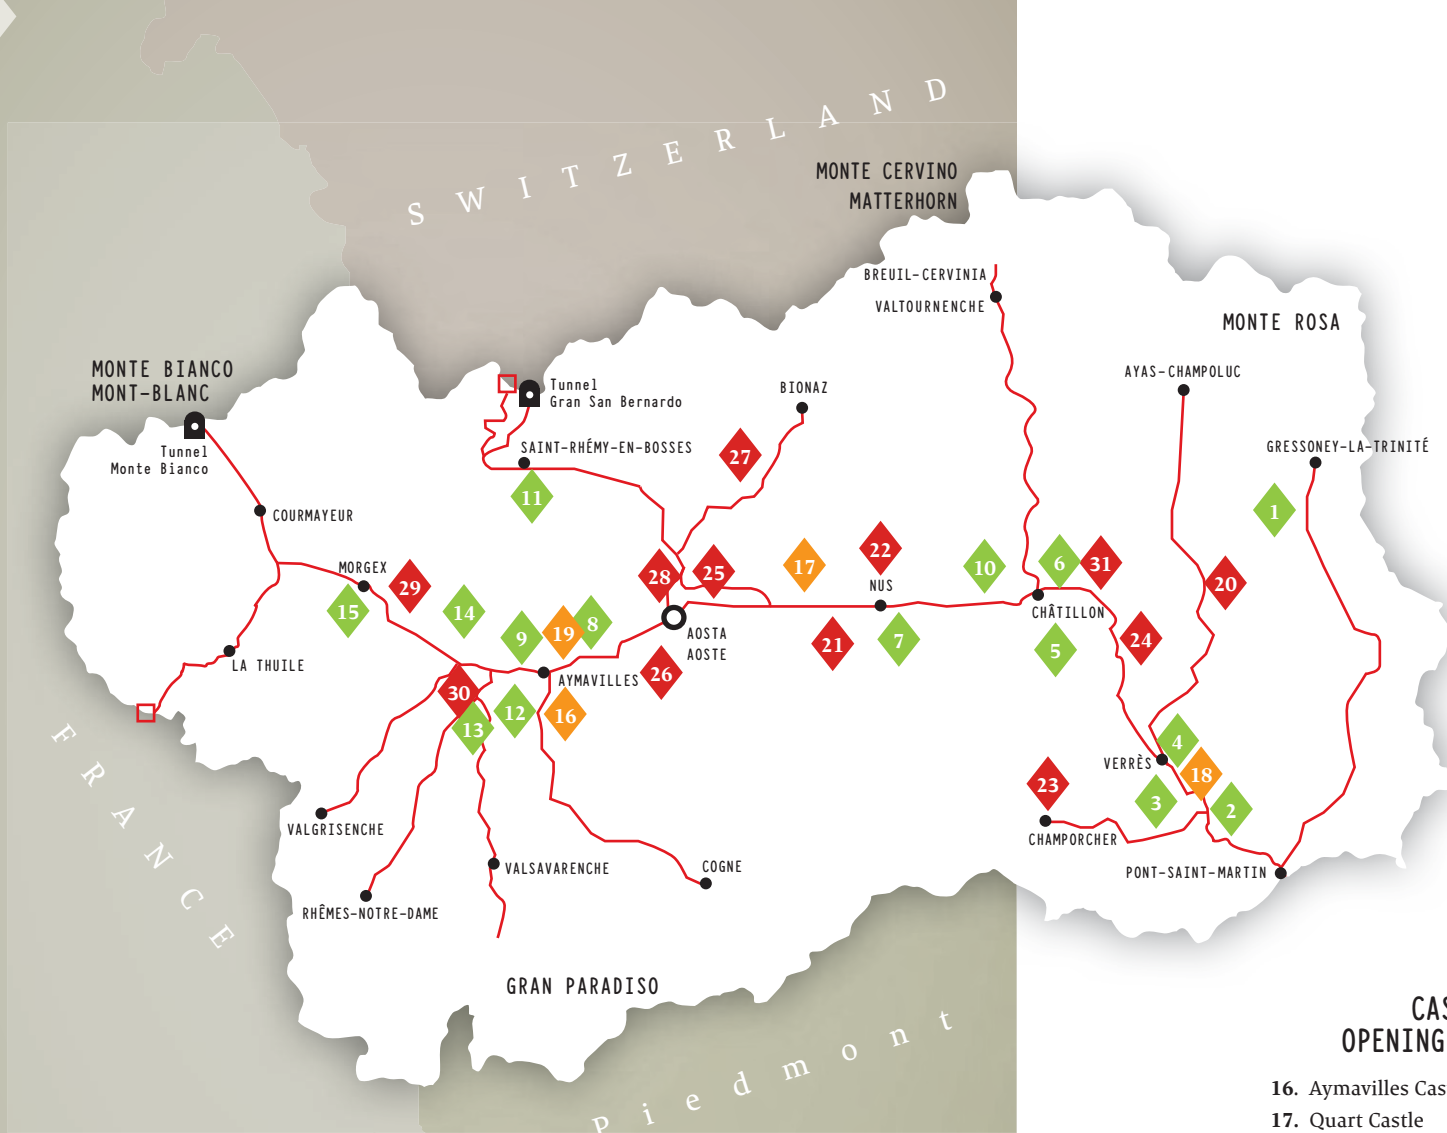

A significant and rich cultural heritage made up of castles, strongholds and historic buildings welcomes those visiting the Aosta Valley or travelling through. Indeed, the many castles scattered along the region's central valley are of outstanding beauty and cultural interest. Built in strategic places to defend ancient lands, these castles with their variety of styles and architectural features are a valuable testimony to the history of the Aosta Valley.

The stylistic evolution of the fortressin to a fine manor house is evident in the castles of Aymavilles and Issogne, whereas the abodes of Sarre and Savoy Castle of Gressoney-Saint-Jean are testimonies to the presence of the Savoy dynasty in the Aosta Valley and the artistic taste in vogue in that court.

In the summer, the magic of this places is even greater as the castles become spectacular scenery for emotionally charged musical events. Guests are treated to refined and exclusive evenings as the events feature artists of national and international caliber.

Discovering this artistic heritage is embarking on a journey through time, through the emotions and passions of times gone by can be relived.

SAVOY CASTLE

GRESSONEY-SAINTE-JEAN

A fairytale residence for Queen Margaret of Savoy

Nestling among the pines in the Gressoney Valley, the Savoy castle has a fairytale atmosphere. It is embellished by five towers that are all different from each other and topped with conical roofs. Its construction, however, dates back to the early 1900s, when Queen Margaret of Savoy, wife of King Humbert I, had this elegant residence built for summer holidays.

The spot on which the castle stands is called 'Belvedere', an Italian word meaning 'panoramic viewpoint', and in fact the view that can be enjoyed from the castle is really breathtaking, and the interior of the castles is just as stunning: the three floors retain ornamental paintings and boiseries and other elegant decorations, often representing daisies in honour of the Queen, whose Italian name Margherita just means 'daisy'. Must-sees among the castle's annexes are the Belvedere Villa, which was the old guest quarters, and the alpine garden set up in the park.

BARD FORTRESS

From military fortress to temple of culture

A steep rock overlooking a narrow gorge,
the only access road to the Aosta Valley:
this is the ideal place for a fortress.

In fact, from the Romans to Hannibal, from Napoleon – who took 15 days to storm it – to the House of Savoy, the Bard fortress's past is a succession of wars and sieges. Indeed, its architectural structure is a clear representation of the evolution of military techniques. It was originally a fortified castle and was rebuilt by Charles Felix of Savoy, who constructed three large buildings, known as Opere, which are spread along the rocky outcrop's flank.

Today the Bard stronghold no longer fulfils its original defensive function. It now houses the Alps Museum, which is accessed via a spectacular system of panoramic lifts, an interactive play area called Le Alpi dei Ragazzi (The Children's Alps),
and a themed route dedicated to the Fort's history,
set in the ancient prison of the castle.

In anticipation of the opening of the Bard
Fortress Museum, and the Borders Museum,
a rich program of temporary exhibitions,
performances and cultural events always provides reasons to visit it.

ISSOGNE CASTLE

Frescoes depicting Renaissance life

The Issogne Castle is an elegant and refined mansion rather than a defensive building. The castle owes its splendour to Georges de Challant, who transformed the old building into a sumptuous treasure trove of art. The inner courtyard of the castle displays masterpieces such as the Pomegranate Fountain, a wrought iron life-sized tree full of symbolic meaning, and a striking series of frescoes.

These frescoes, together with the wonderful decorations embellishing the inner rooms, were designed for a didactic and educational purpose: the lively scenes depicted provide a vibrant testimony of the situation of social peace and well-being created and ensured by the enlightened rule of the Challant family. The castle rooms – from the ones designed to host official events to the kitchen and private rooms – still have original pieces of furniture that help reconstruct the everyday life of the time.

VERRÈS CASTLE

*An imposing castle
to defend the Ayas Valley*

Its massive size and austere structure reveal at first sight the original defensive function of the Verrès Castle, which was strategic for the control of the Ayas Valley. Perched on top of a rocky peak, it is a perfect cube of 30 metres on each side, with outer walls 2.50 metres thick, refined by battlements.

Stone is also the main feature within the castle walls; indeed it can be found in the extraordinary staircase and elegant decor of the rooms, which are characterized by massive chimneys and Gothic windows.

The castle's history is intertwined with the noble Challant family of the Aosta Valley: it was Ibleto, who in 1390 gave the fortress its unusual monolithic structure, which was then enhanced by a curtain wall and a drawbridge at the behest of Renato de Challant.

USSEL CASTLE

CHÂTILLON

From Ebalò to Marcel Bich

Built around 1343 by Ebalò II de Challant, this mighty castle that dominates the Châtillon plain was the first castle with a monolithic structure in the Aosta Valley, refined only by cylindrical towers and mullioned windows, all different from each other. It was abandoned and had severely deteriorated over the centuries, when it was bought by Marcel Bich, an entrepreneur from the Aosta Valley and producer of the famous Bic pen, and in 1994 it was donated to the Autonomous Region of Valle d'Aosta. After extensive restoration, the castle now houses temporary exhibitions in its inner rooms, where imposing fireplaces and carved arches can be admired. Since 2000, it has been possible to walk the spectacular parapets that take up part of the building's roof.

GAMBA CASTLE

CHÂTILLON

A place of art and culture

The castle perches on a rocky promontory overlooking Châtillon and was built at the beginning of the twentieth century by Baron Carlo Maurizio Gamba. The castle is characterised by its high central tower – a modern interpretation of the classic medieval donjon. Around the building lies a beautiful park of over 7,000 square metres, which is home to monumental trees, including a sequoia planted in 1888. In 2012, at the end of some complex restoration work, the castle was reopened to the public under a new guise as the museum of modern and contemporary art: 13 rooms house more than 150 works of art by Masters representing the major art movements of the twentieth century and of the avant-garde. In the collection are works by Casorati, De Pisis, Guttuso, Manzù, Giò and Arnaldo Pomodoro, Schifano and by Italo Mus, the artist who is symbol of the Aosta Valley.

FÉNIS CASTLE

*Embattled fortress
and stunning home*

Among the most famous of the castles in the Aosta Valley, Fénis strikes visitors with its triumph of towers and crenellated walls. The castle sits on flat ground, which is unusual; Aimone de Challant improved it by building an impressive defensive system, which also features double curtain walls. However, more than being a fortress, the Fénis castle was a prestigious and refined residence: the courtyard and the rooms inside are rich in frescoes - the result of a decorating campaign started by Aimone's son, Bonifacio in all likelihood. Not to miss is the famous St. George slaying the dragon by Jacquerio and his school, on the stone semicircular courtyard staircase. Many of the furnishings present, which are not original to the castle, were purchased by Alfredo d'Andrade, then Superintendent of Fine Arts, who supervised the restoration work at the end of the nineteenth century thus restoring the castle to its former glory.

SARRE CASTLE

The alpine residence of the Hunting King

Although it is of medieval origin, the Sarre castle was completely rebuilt between the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries when it became the summer residence of the royal family of Savoy.

The high crenellated tower that stands in the centre of the building is all that remains of the ancient history of the manor, which was bought in 1708 by Baron Jean-François Ferrod, who renovated it before going bankrupt. Then, in 1869 the castle was purchased by Victor Emmanuel II who turned into a residence for hunting trips. Reminders of the 'Hunting King' and his successor, Humbert I's hunting trophies remain in the Hall of Trophies, which is decorated with the antlers of over one thousand ibex and seven hundred chamois. The castle, which was also used by King Humbert II and his wife Marie José, displays the different historical phases of the presence of the House of Savoy in the Aosta Valley.

SARRIOD DE LA TOUR CASTLE

SAINT-PIERRE

The ancient donjon and the Medieval Grottesque

The castle belonged to the eponymous Sarriod de La Tour family for more than seven centuries. It is the result of the assembly of several buildings dating back to different historical eras, including large curtain walls. Around the massive central tower, which is a classic example of a donjon, a fortified residence was developed in a flat area surrounded by gardens and orchards. The castle was extensively revised by Jean de La Tour in 1420 and then by his son Antoine, yet it still retains significant fragments of frescoes from the fifteenth century. The room known as hall of heads is decorated with 171 carved figures, sometimes grotesque and licentious, which are a curious testimony of medieval imagination. The chapel is much older and reveals fragments of thirteenth century paintings, which are among the oldest and most striking examples of figurative art in the Aosta Valley.

CLY CASTLE SAINT-DENIS

*A fortified refuge
perched on the rock*

An imposing tower surrounded by a large perimeter of crenellated walls, perched on a steep rock: it is not hard to imagine this castle as a perfect fortified refuge.

In the eleventh century were built the central tower, the donjon, and the small adjacent chapel, which is has a rectangular layout with semicircular apses.

The lordship of Cly was very important in the area and, according to legend, some of its members were guilty of extortion and military aggression against merchants, which was enough to justify the expropriation of the castle in 1376 by the House of Savoy. It was sold in 1550, and was severely damaged by the passing of time and by its last owner, Pierre-Philibert Roncas, who in the seventeenth century recycled some materials and used them to build his new residence in Chambave.

BOSSES CASTLE SAINT-RHÉMY-EN-BOSSES

A high altitude castle

Only the strategic position at the Great St. Bernard pass can justify the construction of the castle at such high altitude, at over 1,600 metres above sea level. Of very ancient origins – a nobleman named de Bocha is mentioned in a document dating back to the end of the eleventh century – the castle was destroyed in the fourteenth century on the orders of the House of Savoy, in all likelihood because the landowners had refused to pay feudal homage.

It was later rebuilt at the beginning of the fifteenth century in today's monolithic structure, adorned with cross windows by the lords of Bosses, who held the property until 1742.

Today it is the headquarters of the cross-border cultural centre Pays du Grand-Saint-Bernard and hosts temporary exhibitions and cultural events.

CHÂTEL- ARGENT

VILLENEUVE

Defensive tower and ancient mint

The ancient name Castrum Argenti lends itself to the hypothesis that, during the Middle Ages, money was minted within the wall of this castle. It is certain that the castle's function was defensive rather than residential. Indeed the large curtain walls and the thick walls of the circular tower, sixteen metres high and only accessible via a door located 5 metres up from the ground, are all evidence of its defensive purpose.

The site is in a strategic position and has always been under the direct control of the House of Savoy: the current structure dates back to the late thirteenth century, and was probably the work of an English military architect at the service of Count Peter II of Savoy, whereas the splendid Romanesque chapel belongs to the oldest part of the building, dating back to the first half of the twelfth century.

INTROD

CASTLE

A Neo-gothic castle

Seen from above, Introd looks different to any of the other Aosta Valley castles: it is a polygonal crenellated structure which seems to embrace the square based keep.

Its origins date back to the twelfth century, when a defensive structure was built in a strategic position on a promontory protected by two rivers, hence the name Introd (entre les eaux, i.e. between the waters). It later passed to the Sarriod family and in the early twentieth century it was bought by the banker Gonella from Turin, who commissioned the architect Chevalley to carry out significant restoration of the building in neo-gothic style.

The kitchen, however, is still the original one; its entire vault serves as a hood for the great fireplace.

AVISE CASTLE

A family abode

Built in the late fifteenth century by Bonifacio d'Avise, this castle is a large three-storey rectangular block, with a slightly taller tower on the west side. Refined by window frames of carved stone, it was the elegant residence of the d'Avise family, whose motto is carved on the door. The motto plays on the double meaning of the word Avise 'qui tost Avise tart se repent' (think before not to regret afterwards).

The rooms inside testify to the refined taste of the owners of the time: the pewter hall has a large fireplace and a collection of ornaments, while the hall of shelves owes its name to the fourteen wooden sculptures that decorate the ceiling beams.

TOUR DE L'ARCHET MORGEX

From ancient tower to modern study centre

The core of the castle is the imposing square base tower, which dominates the inhabited area of Morgex: it is an extraordinary construction, nine metres wide, with walls that are more than two and a half metres thick and built with regular and perfectly squared stone blocks. It was only at a later date, between the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, that the other buildings which make up the castle were built. The castle was owned for a lengthy period by the de l'Archet family, so called because they had taken up residence inside the Arch of Augustus near Aosta. The residence at Morgex also hosted the Count of Savoy during the general audiences, during which subjects were required to pay feudal homage. It is currently home to the Natalino Sapegno Foundation, which is dedicated to the great historian of literature from the Aosta Valley.

Giving back cultural heritage to the community

Cultural heritage is made up of absolutely unique and precious documents that help to understand the process that has led to the formation of the identity of a territory.

Cultural heritage represents one of the fundamental pieces of the puzzle in order to reflect upon the history, culture and particularism of the Aosta Valley.

The policy of Restitution, supported by the Autonomous Region of Valle d'Aosta, aims at giving the cultural heritage of the territory, both tangible and intangible, back to the citizens, while involving the community in the process of cultural heritage protection and enhancement, and spreading, in an educational and informative manner, the results of scientific research and practices for the protection and conservation of the territory.

With this in mind, a number of initiatives were organised to enhance historic and artistic heritage, which included buildings and works of art undergoing restoration, which had been closed to the public due to the long work they required.

One of the first positive experiences of active participation was the event 'Cantieri evento', which made archaeological work sites accessible to the public in the piazzas of Aosta, and thus allowed citizens to get to know and share the work in progress.

The experience was then extended to castles undergoing restoration with the initiative Châteaux ouverts, which opened the doors of some castles attracting a growing influx of residents and tourists and has allowed the temporary opening of the castles of Quart, Aymavilles and Arnad, which are undergoing intensive restoration in order to host future museum displays and to be opened to the public.

AYMAVILLES CASTLE

Between the Middle Ages and Baroque

Located at the entrance of the Cogne Valley, Aymavilles is different to the other castles of the Aosta Valley: its vertical and elegant silhouette, characterised by four round towers crowned with battlements, is unmistakable. Even though it dates back to the twelfth century, the castle was substantially altered over time, until it reached its current style which has obvious Baroque influences.

The castle was enfeoffed in 1354 to Aimone de Challant, lord of Fénis, and the four round towers was probably built by his son, Amedeo. These four towers form two pairs, each with a circumference and type of battlement different to the other pair. At the beginning of the eighteenth century, Joseph-Félix of Challant transformed the castle into an elegant and refined abode, by building of the great galleries that fill the distance between the towers and which are decorated with a rich array of plasters.

QUART CASTLE

Several buildings, one castle

Enclosed by a large curtain walls, the castle is an imposing complex of buildings of different periods, which come together in a harmonic and striking architectural unit. It was the heart of the vast estate of the Lords of Quart, who together with the Challant family were among the most important families of the Aosta Valley. The castle came back under the House of Savoy in 1378 with the death of the last male heir, Enrico de Quart. As a result of no longer being used as a residence, it fell into disrepair and was used for farming purposes. Current restoration work has brought to light many fragments of frescoes, dating from the thirteenth century to the sixteenth century, in various areas of the castle: the donjon, the great hall known as the magna aula and the chapel, which was rebuilt during the early seventeenth century and is adorned with precious stucco elements.

VALLAISE CASTLE

ARNAD

Four castles for one family

The Vallaise family possessed four residences in the Arnad area: the high castle, a true fortress bought from the de Arnado lords in the twelfth century; the low castle, which was built during the first half of the fifteenth century, the Hôtel stronghold, and finally the Château Vallaise.

The latter is an elegant residence which sits half-way up the valley, long divided between the two branches of the family, the Vallaise-Romagnano and the Vallaise-Montalto.

The rooms for official events, the private rooms and the weapons' gallery are richly frescoed with historical and mythological representations, among which several images linked to the female epic, a series of paintings on biblical history, as well as paintings on war themes. The castle was bought in 2010 by the Autonomous Region of Valle d'Aosta.

SAINT-PIERRE CASTLE

From the Middle Ages to Neo-gothic

It looks like a fairytale castle, almost timeless, its origins and much of its structure are ancient: the castle, owned by the de Sancto Petro (i.e. 'Saint-Pierre') family, is mentioned in a document dating back to 1191. After an intricate 'co-lordship', it passed on to the Roncas family in the seventeenth century: Pierre-Philibert was to turn it into 'house of delights', thus it became a place of parties and receptions. During the second half of the nineteenth century it was acquired by Baron Emanuele Bollati who – in the full bloom of Romanticism – wished to give it an aspect which was more in keeping with the medieval ideal, which he achieved by adding numerous battlements and four small towers pitched against the central keep. The castle will house the Regional Museum of Natural Sciences.
